Scope

The Journal of Physiology welcomes papers in all areas of physiology. Authors should present original work that illustrates new physiological principles or mechanisms. Papers on work at the molecular level, at the level of the cell membrane, single cells, tissues or organs and on systems physiology are all acceptable. Theoretical papers will be considered if based on experimentally derived data and if the hypothesis advanced is directly amenable to experimental testing. While emphasis is on human and mammalian physiology, work on lower vertebrate or invertebrate preparations may be suitable if it furthers the understanding of the functioning of other organisms including mammals.

Some papers may be rejected on the grounds that the subject matter is too specialized or that the contribution they make is insufficient to justify publication.

The Journal of Physiology publishes full-length Research Papers, Rapid Reports of particularly important work that merits accelerated publication, and Perspectives and Topical Reviews solicited by the Editorial Board to highlight areas of special physiological interest. All categories of papers are subjected to the same review procedure.
